Believe Him Guiltless.

Professor James A. Davis and his two brothers, Mesers. Chas. W. and J. M. Davis, have written a public etatement to the Abingdon Virginian of their reasons for refusing to believe that Dr. Baker poisoned his wife, who was their sister. They say:

"Many sensational articles appeared in the newspapers during the trial which were caloulated, if not really intended, to birs the public mird against the accused, and the verdict rendered by the jury had acarcely reached the ears of the prisoner before it was boldly accounced through the same papers that the verdict accorded with the views of the great majority of the people, and now after the unhappy man has fallen beneath the blows of the prosecution there are those who would stab him sgain and again.

"Why is this being done? The question is even raised why the Davis brothers did not join the prosecution in a clamor for the life of the accessed to avenge the death of their sister? It is due to ourselves, to the prisoner and to the public that we state some of the ressons for the course we pursued. Toere was nothing manifest in the previous life of the accused that showed him capable of committing crime, hence by law, both buman and divine, we were required at least to remain ellent and consider him innocent until by investigation he might be proven guilty. That investigation has been made with a degree of rigor that denied the accused the benefit of existing doubts, and yet the evidence, which we have carefully stu-ded, has falled to prove that Baker poleoned his wife, the impression still remaining that our sister may have died from natural

'Our intimate connection with the Baker family gave us an insight into their domettic relations and a knowledge of our sister's physical condition at certain periods, un-known to the general public. Her aliments on the week of her death did not differ materially, except in severity, from what they had been on some previous occasions. Her ilinees began on Saturday and increased gradually, though intermittently, until she died on the Wednesday following: By habits of industry she was accustomed to labor to a degree far beyond her strength, and hence we infer the chief cause of her sill ctions. The entire absence of the main eymptoms that attend areenical poisoning, such as thirs, vomiting and purging, and the time that must have elapsed between the taking of the poison and effects indi-cate that death was produced by other causes. The autopsy proved nothing not otherwise explained.

"A cloud bangs over the origin of the letters that were so strangely hidden and so readily found, and a cloud is on the character and testimony of the chief accuser, but even if the letters be genuine and the testi-money true, what do they prove more than wicked design on Baker's part, for purposes unknows to us, to produce an impression on the mind of his paramour that he had done incredible things and made incredible sacrifices for her, and even intensifying this by a most untimely visit to her house. In view of these and other circumstances involving doubt need anybody wonder that when a jury composed of men as honest and truthful as the country can furnish, yet overstrained possibly in their judgment by the extreme rigor of the prose-cution and its attendant rulings, brought in their verdict, were astonished more than when we heard of our sister's death.

"May we not then pending other proceedings which may follow, invoke from a generous public fair and calm consideration of this matter, such as we ourselves, who mourn the loss of a favorite sister, are willing to give, unmoved by the sensational items and heartless criticism that spring either from cupidity or hatred."
